Sri Lanka: Continuing impunity, arbitrary detentions, torture and enforced disappearances

On Thursday 1 November, the UN Universal Periodic Review (UPR) of the human rights situation in Sri Lanka will take place – the first such review since May 2008, when the government was engaged in an armed conflict with the Tamil Tigers (LTTE) in the country's north.

Amnesty International notes the lack of progress on a number of human rights issues highlighted in the first review four years ago, and has raised these concerns in a submission to the UPR.

While the government of Sri Lanka has defeated the LTTE, it has failed to implement commitments to enhance human rights protections and to account for past violations.

It has yet to repeal oppressive anti-terrorism legislation which is used to justify abusive practices including arbitrary detention and restrictions on freedom of expression. A lack of witness protection laws and continued lack of independence of the National Human Rights Commission had added to a culture of impunity for human rights violations.

Amnesty International continues to receive reports of enforced disappearances, torture and other ill-treatment in detention, which the authorities refuse to investigate. Security forces' use of arbitrary arrests and detentions have targeted members of armed groups, political opponents and journalists.
