INDIGENOUS LEADER KILLED IN ARGENTINA

Indigenous leader Cristian Ferreyra has been killed by two security guards working for a landowner. He was a member of Lule Vilela indigenous community. The community has been receiving threats and intimidation because of their fight to defend their ancestral lands, which is under threat from deforestation.

On 16 November, Cristian Ferreyra and his brother in law, Darío Godoy, confronted a man who was fencing off part of the land claimed by their community as part of their traditional territory. Later on they went to Cristian Ferreyra’s house in the community of San Antonio, in the province of Santiago del Estero. Two armed men approached the house and called for them to go out into the courtyard. As they did so, one of the armed men shot Cristian Ferreyra, who died on his way to hospital. Darío Godoy was also shot in the legs and remains in hospital. Members of the Lule Vilela community state that the two armed men worked for a landowner in neighbouring Santa Fe province who wants to expand soybean plantations onto their land. The community claims the land as their ancestral land, vital to their survival. They also state it has important water reserves for their animals.

Four people have been arrested, including the person identified by an eyewitness as the one who shot Cristian Ferreyra and Darío Godoy. The judge has also ordered the immediate arrest of the landowner.

Cristian Ferreyra and Darío Godoy are members of the Mocase Vila Campesina, a peasant movement in Santiago del Estero. The organisation has been at the forefront of the fight against the impact of deforestation on lands owned by indigenous and peasant communities by agro-business farmers. Cristian Ferreyra and Darío Godoy were due to meet other members of the organisation to discuss legal actions against deforestation on the day that they were shot.

ADDITIONAL INFORMATION

The Lule Vilela community of San Antonio are formed by 14 families; they live close to three other Lule Vilela communities, Campos de Mayo, Santa Lucia, and San Bernardo. For over three years they, as well as local farmers, have faced numerous threats, intimidation and harassment due to their struggle to defend their ancestral land from the interests of landowners who were allowed to acquire the lands by the provincial authorities for the expansion of soy crops in the territory.

The Mocase Villa Campesina organisation has reported that eight months ago the same landowner ordered the installation of a wire fence within the territory which obstructed access to the community school. Some members of the community tried to unblock access by cutting the wire fence but they received threats. Two months ago the local community radio was subjected to an arson attack destroying some of the equipment. According to the Mocase Villa Campesina, complaints filled before the local judicial authorities have been ignored.

More widely, there have been recent episodes of intimidation and harassment against Indigenous Peoples’ rights in Argentina, that in some cases have ended with terrible consequences.

Indigenous community leader Félix Diaz and his family have been facing several threats by members of a non indigenous family (criollo) who claim ownership of land that Toba Qom indigenous community members consider their traditional land. Recently on 8 November 2011, he son and grandson of Félix Diaz, were attacked by men. In November 2010, police violently dispersed a roadblock by members of the community leaving one community member and one police officer dead. Police also burned temporary housing built by the community. In July, video footage was made public about the violent police operation of November 2010. So far no one has been brought to justice for these events.

On 12 October 2009, Javier Chocobar, a 68-year-old from Diaguita Indigenous community of Los Chuschagasta, was killed when local landowner arrived in the community with two other men identified as former police officers.
