

URGENT ACTION

TWO CHINESE LABOUR ACTIVISTS STILL DETAINED

Labour activist He Xiaobo was released on 7 April, but two other labour activists – Zeng Feiyang and Meng Han remain in detention, solely as a result of their legitimate activities defending workers' rights in Guangdong province. The sudden release of He Xiaobo suggests that actions may be having an impact, but appeals are still needed for the two remaining in detention.

Zeng Feiyang, the director of Panyu Workers' Centre and one of the region's most influential labour rights leaders, and activist Meng Han, have been detained since December 2015. They were formally arrested for "gathering a crowd to disturb social order" on 10 January. Activist He Xiaobo was released on 7 April, and Tang Jian and Zhu Xiaomei were released in early February.

Zeng Feiyang and Meng Han are detained at Guangzhou City No. 1 Detention Centre. Zeng Feiyang has still not had access to his lawyer since he was first detained. Meng Han has only had sporadic legal access.

Their detention and arrest form part of a coordinated crackdown on the labour movement in Guangdong Province, at a time of escalating industrial tensions in the region. Thirty-three activists were also questioned as part of the crackdown, and then released. Official state media appears to be conducting a smear campaign against the activists, with several outlets accusing them of inciting workers to strike and of accepting funding from foreign organizations.

Please write immediately in Chinese, English or your own language:

- Demanding the authorities immediately and unconditionally release Zeng Feiyang, and Meng Han;
- Pending their release, urging authorities to grant the detainees regular, unrestricted access to their family and lawyers, and ensure they are not subjected to torture and other ill-treatment.

URGENT ACTION

ADDITIONAL INFORMATION

The industrial province of Guangdong, situated in south-east China, has been dubbed the “factory of the world” due to the numerous factories in the province that make up the supply chains of major global industries including textiles, electronics, consumer goods, and toys.

In recent years, China has enacted legislation and regulations to protect workers’ rights, but there is poor implementation of the laws. Independent unions are banned, and the All-China Federation of Trade Unions (ACFTU) is the only body allowed to represent workers in China. ACFTU-affiliated unions at the enterprise level are often controlled by factory management, thus giving them little capacity to protect workers’ interests.

Numerous labour NGOs have formed over the past decades in order to help workers protect their legal rights. Labour leader Zeng Feiyang, who is currently under criminal detention, first founded his NGO in 1998. While labour NGOs have at times faced harassment by authorities and resistance from local factories, to a large extent they have been tolerated, and even encouraged, by the local and provincial governments, because they are recognized for their ability to bring greater social stability by helping workers through legal education training, filing lawsuits, assisting workers who have suffered industrial injuries, and providing other social services.

However, over the past year or more, labour activists have faced greater harassment and even physical threats and attacks, as the economy slows down in China, and many factories leave Guangdong province due to higher costs. China Labour Bulletin, a labour advocacy group in Hong Kong, recorded 301 strikes in China in November 2015, which was an all-time high number. A total of 56 strikes were in Guangdong province, which was more than double the number of strikes in any other province.

The crackdown on labour NGOs also comes after an unprecedented crackdown on lawyers and activists beginning in the summer of 2015, in which over 250 were targeted, to date 18 have been formally arrested.
