"DisappeaCHAD Abel Karim Abbo Sileck, aged 21, Student

Abel Karim Abbo Sileck has "disappeared" after being taken away by two men believed to be members of the Chadian security forces. Amnesty International is concerned for his safety.

The two men reportedly took Abel Karim Abbo Sileck from his home in the Arboutsoulba district of the Chadian capital, N'Djaména, at around 11pm on 26 June. He has not been seen since. He is rumoured to be detained somewhere in N'Djaména, but there is no confirmation of his whereabouts.

The reason for his arrest is not known. Abel Karim Abbo Sileck is reportedly not involved in opposition activities. However, he may have been arrested on suspicion of having links with the Chadian armed opposition, since at least one member of his close family is known to be involved with the opposition.

BACKGROUND INFORMATION

Torture and ill-treatment is routine in Chad, particularly in the early stages of detention. Detainees are at greater risk of ill-treatment, torture or extrajudicial execution when held incommunicado or in unauthorized or undisclosed places of detention. They are also at particular risk when arrested by unidentified units of the security forces - a practice which has been common in Chad in the past. Those suspected of having links with armed opposition groups may be especially vulnerable, particularly as the security forces operate virtually with total impunity.

Armed conflict is sustained in the north of the country, where government troops are fighting the armed political group Mouvement pour la Démocratie et la Justice au Tchad (MDJT), Movement for Democracy and Justice, which is led by Youssouf Toujoumi, a former minister of defence and justice. Several other opposition groups are also sporadically active in the north. There was a brief resurgence of conflict in the south during 2000.

President Idriss Déby was re-elected in presidential elections in May 2001. Demonstrations protesting at the results were violently repressed by the security forces, and two opposition leaders were briefly detained. They were ill-treated in custody.
