The Protocol on the Rights of Women in Africa:

Strengthening the promotion and protection of women's human rights in Africa

1. Introduction

On 11 July 2003, the African Union (AU) Assembly of Heads of State and Government adopted the Protocol to the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights on the Rights of Women in Africa (Protocol) during its Second Ordinary Summit in Maputo, Mozambique.¹ The Protocol would enter into force thirty days after the date of the deposit of the fifteenth instrument of ratification or accession.

As of May 2004, only Comoros has ratified the Protocol, although twenty-eight countries have signed the document. They are: Algeria; Benin; Burkina Faso; Burundi; Côte d'Ivoire; Congo; Djibouti; Democratic Republic of Congo; Gambia; Ghana; Guinea; Kenya; Libya; Lesotho; Liberia; Madagascar; Mali; Mozambique; Namibia; Nigeria; Rwanda; South Africa; Senegal; Sierra Leone; Tanzania; Togo; Uganda, and Zimbabwe.

Amnesty International welcomed the adoption of the Protocol as a landmark step in enhancing the promotion and protection of women's human rights on the continent, providing a comprehensive legal framework for holding African governments accountable for their violation of those human rights. The Protocol is consistent with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights' (UDHR) proclamation that "everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex ... or other status." (Article 2 - emphasis added).

Although the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights (African Charter) imposes obligations on states parties to eliminate discrimination against women and to ensure the protection of internationally recognized women's human rights, the Protocol provides more comprehensive and specific guarantees with regard to women's human rights than the Charter.

The Protocol recognizes and guarantees a wide range of women's civil and political rights as well as economic, social and cultural rights, thus reaffirming the universality, indivisibility and interdependency of all internationally recognized human rights of women. These rights include the right to life, integrity and security of person; protection from harmful traditional practices; prohibition of discrimination; and the protection of women in armed conflict. Furthermore, the Protocol guarantees to every woman the right to respect as a person and to the full development of her personality; prohibition of exploitation or degradation; access to justice and equal protection before the law; participation in the political and decision making process.

The Protocol also guarantees the right to health and reproductive rights of women; the right to food security, and the right to adequate housing. The Protocol also commits states parties, if they have not already done so, to include in their national constitutions and other legislative instruments these fundamental principles and ensure their effective implementation. In addition, it obligates them to integrate a gender perspective in their policy decisions, legislation, development plans, and activities, and to ensure the overall well-being of women.

The African Commission will monitor the implementation of the Protocol through states submission of periodic reports under the African Charter but the African Court on Human and Peoples' Rights (African Court) "shall be seized with matters of interpretation arising from the application on implementation of this Protocol." However, the African Commission shall have the mandate to interpret the Protocol pending the full establishment of the African Court.

Numerous violations of women's human rights – solely or primarily because of their gender – still occur on a daily basis in Africa. They include female genital mutilation, forced marriage, discrimination, domestic violence, sexual exploitation and rape. These abuses result from, and are compounded by, women's social and economic inequality: lack of access to education, land, financial resources and health care and their inequality within the family.

The challenge is for African governments and other stakeholders to translate the fine statements of the Protocol into reality regionally and nationally. Amnesty International calls on African governments to ratify the Protocol, and ensure its prompt entry into force. African inter-governmental organizations, including the AU Commission and the African Commission should encourage the full ratification and implementation of the Protocol at the national level. Although implementation is the primary responsibility of governments, inter-governmental organizations have a crucial role to play in this respect.

This document summarizes the main provisions of the Protocol and gives a brief overview of the monitoring mechanisms that it establishes. Its aim is to raise awareness of the Protocol and to encourage states to ratify it as a matter of priority.

2. Summary of guarantees under the Protocol

The text of the Protocol comprises of a preamble and twenty-nine articles. The Protocol aims to give greater attention to the human rights of women in Africa. Specifically, it aims to promote the principles of equality, peace, freedom, dignity, justice, solidarity and democracy. Furthermore, the Protocol defines “discrimination against women”² and “violence against women”³, and outlines measures which states parties are required to take in both the public and private spheres to end such practices. It covers a range of topics, including employment, education, voting rights, nationality laws, rights in marriage and divorce, health care, reproductive rights, and equality before the law.

The Protocol requires states parties to adopt legislative, institutional and other measures to eliminate all forms of discrimination against women. As stated above, states parties must integrate a gender perspective in their policy decisions, legislation, development plans, programmes and activities. They are also required to modify the social and cultural patterns of conduct of women and men through public education, information, education and communication strategies, in order to eliminate harmful cultural, traditional and other practices based on the idea of the inferiority or the superiority of either of the sexes, or on stereotyped roles for women and men.

Furthermore, states parties agree to adopt and implement measures to: prohibit exploitation or degradation of women; protect women from all forms of violence, including sexual and verbal violence whether the violence takes place in private or public; and generally prevent, punish and eradicate violence against women. They also agree to identify the causes and consequences of violence against women and adopt measures to address them; eradicate elements in traditional and cultural beliefs, practices and stereotypes which legitimise and exacerbate violence against women; and establish mechanisms and accessible services for effective information, rehabilitation and reparation for victims of violence against women. Additionally, the Protocol requires states parties to prevent and condemn trafficking in women; prosecute the perpetrators of such acts; protect those women most at risk; prohibit medical or scientific experiments on women without their informed consent; and provide adequate budgetary and other resources for the implementation and monitoring of actions to prevent violence against women.

² Under the Protocol, “Discrimination against women” means “any distinction, exclusion or restriction or any differential treatment based on sex and whose objectives or effects compromise or destroy the recognition, enjoyment or the exercise by women, regardless of their marital status, of human rights and fundamental freedoms in all spheres of life.”

³ Under the Protocol, “violence against women” means “all acts perpetrated against women which cause or could cause them physical, sexual, psychological, and economic harm, including the threat to take such acts; or to undertake the imposition of arbitrary restrictions on or deprivation of fundamental freedoms in private or public life in peace time and during situations of armed conflicts or of war.”

Moreover, the Protocol requires states parties to prohibit and condemn practices such as “female genital mutilation, scarification, medicalisation and para-medicalisation of female genital mutilation” which negatively affect the human rights of women and which are contrary to recognised international standards. They must provide necessary support to victims, including through health services, legal and judicial support, emotional and psychological counselling as well as vocational training. Furthermore, they must ensure effective access by women to judicial and legal services, including legal aid; provide adequate training for law enforcement officials to effectively interpret and enforce gender equality rights; and allow equal representation of women in the judiciary and law enforcement agencies.

The Protocol also requires states parties to ensure, through legislative and other measures, that: women and men enjoy equal rights and are regarded as equal partners in marriage; no marriage shall take place without the free and full consent of both parties; and that the minimum age of marriage for women shall be 18 years. According to the Protocol, states parties must “encourage monogamy as the preferred form of marriage.”

Under the Protocol, states parties have an obligation to take specific positive action to promote participative governance and the equal participation of women in the political life of their countries through affirmative action, enabling national legislation and other measures. The Protocol also guarantees to every woman the right to peace and obligates states parties to ensure the participation of women in processes for conflict prevention, management and resolution at all levels; and in planning, formulation and implementation of post-conflict reconstruction and rehabilitation.

The Protocol also requires states parties to respect and ensure respect for the rules of international humanitarian law applicable in armed conflict situations, which affect the population, particularly women; protect asylum seeking women, refugees, returnees and internally displaced persons, against all forms of violence; ensure that rape and other forms of sexual exploitation are considered war crimes, genocide and/or crimes against humanity; and bring suspected perpetrators to justice before a competent criminal jurisdiction. Furthermore, they must ensure that “no child, especially girls under 18 years of age, take a direct part in hostilities and that no child is recruited as a soldier.”

The Protocol obligates states parties to ensure that women and men enjoy equal rights of access to refugee status determination procedures and that women refugees are accorded the full protection and benefits guaranteed under international refugee law; and in those countries where the death penalty still exists, not to carry out death sentences on pregnant or nursing women.

In addition, states parties are required to: guarantee equal opportunity and access to women in the sphere of education and training; eliminate all stereotypes in textbooks, syllabuses and the media; protect women, especially the girl-child from all forms of abuse; and provide for sanctions against suspected perpetrators of such practices. They must also provide access to counselling and rehabilitation services to women who suffer abuses and sexual harassment; integrate gender sensitisation and human rights education at all levels of education curricula; and promote literacy among women. Furthermore, states parties must adopt measures to promote equality of access to employment; promote the right to equal remuneration for jobs of equal value for women and men; ensure transparency in recruitment, promotion and dismissal of women and punish sexual harassment in the workplace.

The Protocol also requires states parties to guarantee to women the freedom to choose their occupation, and their human rights as recognised by conventions and laws must be fully guaranteed and respected. States parties are required to create conditions to promote and support the occupations and economic activities of women; establish a system of protection and social insurance for women working in the informal sector and sensitise them to adhere to it. They must introduce a minimum age for work and prohibit the employment of children below that age, and prohibit and punish “all forms of exploitation of children, especially the girl-child and take measures to recognise the economic value of the work of women in the home.”

The Protocol obligates states parties to guarantee to women adequate and paid pre- and post-natal maternity leave. Furthermore, states parties are required to respect, protect and promote the right to health of women, including sexual and reproductive. Such rights recognized under the Protocol include: the right to control their fertility; the right to decide whether to have children, the number of children and the spacing of children; the right to choose any method of contraception; and the right to protection against sexually transmitted infections, including HIV/AIDS. Other similar rights are: the right to be informed on one's health status and on the health status of one's partner; and the right to have family planning education.

States parties are also required to adopt measures to provide adequate, affordable and accessible health services, including information, education and communication programmes to women; establish and strengthen existing pre-natal, delivery and post-natal health and nutritional services for women during pregnancy and while they are breast-feeding. They must protect the reproductive rights of women “by authorising medical abortion in cases of sexual assault, rape, incest, and where the continued pregnancy endangers the mental and physical health of the mother or the life of the mother or the foetus.” The Protocol also obligates states parties to provide women with access to clean drinking water, sources of domestic fuel, land, and the means of producing nutritious food, and establish adequate systems of supply and storage to ensure food security.

With respect to the right to adequate housing, states parties are required to guarantee to women the right to equal access to housing and to acceptable living conditions in a healthy environment. According to the Protocol, “women shall also have the right to live in a positive cultural context and to participate at all levels in the determination of cultural policies.” In this regard, the Protocol obligates states parties to adopt measures to enhance the participation of women in the formulation of cultural policies at all levels.

The Protocol also extends protection to widows. Accordingly, it requires states parties to ensure that “widows are not subjected to inhuman, humiliating or degrading treatment, that a widow shall automatically become the guardian and custodian of her children, after the death of her husband, unless this is contrary to the interests and the welfare of the children; that a widow shall have the right to remarry, and in that event, to marry the person of her choice, that a widow shall have the right to an equitable share in the inheritance of the property of her husband.” States parties must also ensure that women and men enjoy the right to inherit, in equitable shares, their parents' properties.

States parties are further required to provide protection to elderly women and take specific measures commensurate with their physical, economic and social needs as well as their access to employment and professional training; and ensure the right of elderly women to freedom from violence. They must also ensure the protection of women with disabilities and adopt measures to facilitate their access to employment, professional and vocational training as well as their participation in decision-making.

Furthermore, states parties are required to ensure: “the protection of poor women and women heads of families, the right of pregnant or nursing women or women in detention by providing them with an environment which is suitable to their condition and the right to be treated with dignity.”

Under the Protocol, any woman whose rights have been violated will be entitled to “appropriate remedies” to be determined by competent judicial, administrative, legislative or any other competent authority provided for by law. In addition, states parties are required to provide budgetary and other resources for the full and effective implementation of the rights recognized under the Protocol. States parties are also required to “reduce military expenditure significantly in favour of spending on social development in general and the promotion of women in particular.”

3. Implementation Mechanism

As stated above, the Protocol also provides for an implementing mechanism. According to Article 26, “States Parties shall ensure the implementation of this Protocol at national level, and in their periodic reports submitted in accordance with Article 62 of the African Charter, indicate the legislative and other measures undertaken for the full realisation of the rights herein recognised.”⁴ Furthermore, “the African Court on Human and Peoples' Rights shall be seized with matters of interpretation arising from the application or implementation of this Protocol.”

However, pending the full establishment of the African Court, the African Commission “shall be seized with matters of interpretation arising from the application and implementation of this Protocol.” The African Commission has been established under Article 30 of the African Charter. The African Commission’s primary responsibility under the Charter is to promote and ensure the protection of human rights on the continent. Its four areas of mandate are: promotional activities, protective activities (including complaints), the examination of state party reports and the interpretation of the African Charter. The African Commission holds regular sessions twice a year around April and November, and can hold extraordinary sessions.

The African Commission is composed of 11 members who serve part-time on the Commission. Although they are elected by the AU Assembly of Heads of State and Government from a list of persons nominated by states parties to the African Charter, they are “independent experts” and act in their personal capacities rather than as representatives of their governments. The African Court, established pursuant to a Protocol adopted by the OAU (AU) Assembly of Heads of State and Government in 1998, would have the power to entertain cases challenging violations of the human rights, including civil and political rights and economic, social and cultural rights guaranteed under the African Charter. The Court consists of eleven judges who must be nationals of the member states of the AU. Judges are elected in an individual capacity and not as representatives of states. The Protocol establishing the Court has entered into force and the election of judges to the Court is scheduled to be held during the forthcoming Third Ordinary Summit of the AU Assembly of Heads of State and Government in July 2004, in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia.

The integration of the Protocol into the African Charter implementing mechanism is consistent with the provisions of the Charter itself, and will ensure that women whose rights have been violated under the Protocol will have a final recourse to the African Commission and the African Court to have their rights established and enforced. Furthermore, individuals other than the victims themselves, and human rights non-governmental organizations can bring a complaint on behalf of victims. This is important because of the political, economic, social and cultural factors that so often restrict access by women to information and to practical opportunities to claim their rights. Women’s organizations are well placed to make submissions on their behalf.

4. Conclusions and recommendations

The adoption of the Protocol on the Rights of Women in Africa is a significant development and would ensure the full integration of women’s human rights concerns in the regional human rights framework. The Protocol helps fill a major gap in the regional human rights system, which until now has not developed a comprehensive framework for the promotion and protection of women’s human rights.

Amnesty International believes that the Protocol will allow both the African Commission and the African Court to elaborate how the rights recognized under it should be guaranteed in real life situations. Furthermore, the Protocol would allow these institutions to develop a fuller jurisprudence and a platform for the articulation of international legal principles regarding women's human rights at the regional level as well as direction and precedents for domestic courts and other international institutions such as the UN treaty bodies.

Most importantly however, the Protocol offers a real remedy for women at the regional level. This will give women victims of human rights violations somewhere to turn to, providing them with practical access to bodies which will understand the implications of their experience. But this potential will only be fulfilled if states parties ensure that they meet the needs of women's human rights in practice, and work to implement the commitments they have made. Amnesty International calls on African governments that have not yet done so to:

- Publicly condemn all violations of women's human rights and refrain from engaging in such violations;
- Take action to investigate all allegations of violations of women's human rights by members of the police, security and armed forces and others acting with the acquiescence of the state and bring to justice those suspected to be responsible;
- Ratify the Protocol on the Rights of Women in Africa without further delay and without reservations;
- Implement the Protocol by reviewing all national laws, policies, practices and procedures to ensure that they meet the obligations set out in the Protocol. States parties should incorporate the rights enshrined in the Protocol into their domestic legislation and take all other necessary measures to implement the instrument in good faith;
- Review and amend criminal laws and procedures to eliminate discrimination against women and ensure that women defendants, victims and/or witnesses are not victimized or discriminated against in the investigation and prosecution of crimes;
- Provide constitutional guarantees to prohibit discrimination and ensure equality of men and women;
- Ratify all other regional and international human rights instruments essential for the effective promotion and protection of women's human rights in Africa, including the Protocol to the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights on the Establishment of an African Court on Human and Peoples' Rights and the African Union Convention on Preventing and Combating Corruption. They should also ratify: the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and its two Optional Protocols; the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights; the Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment; the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women; the Convention on the Rights of the Child; the Convention relating to the Status of Refugees; and the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court. Governments who have already ratified these instruments should examine any limiting reservations, with a view to withdrawing them. This is particularly important in the case of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, where the commitment of many governments is seriously undermined by the extent of their reservations;

- Upon ratification, formulate national plans of action to tackle violence against women. Such national plans of action should include time-bound targets for implementing the commitments contained in the Protocol and address the issue of allocation or reallocation of resources for their implementation. Ensuring equality and non-discrimination in law and in practice would mean: addressing impunity for violations of women's human rights; creating and strengthening national institutions for the promotion and protection of human rights; undertaking to review national laws, policies and practices; developing a comprehensive human rights education programme;
- Initiate strategies to develop legal and administrative mechanisms to ensure effective justice for women victims of violence;
- Ensure the provision of specialized assistance for the support and rehabilitation of women whose rights have been violated under the Protocol;
- Train and sensitize judicial and police officials with regards to the women's human rights recognized under the Protocol and other relevant instruments and;
- Take measures to report on the implementation of their obligations under the Protocol and other relevant instruments and to include information on measures taken to implement the commitments contained in the Protocol.
