OPPOSITION MEMBER CHARGED, SET TO STAND TRIAL

Congolese political opposition member, Paulin Makaya who has been detained since 23 November was finally brought before an investigating judge of the High Court of Brazzaville on 1 December. He is held in pre-trial detention at the central prison of Brazzaville facing three different charges.

Paulin Makaya, president of the political party “Unis pour le Congo” (UPC), went to the office of the Public Prosecutor of the High Court of Brazzaville with his lawyer on Monday 23 November to report for questioning as part of an investigation. He was questioned about his alleged participation in an unauthorized protest against a referendum to amend the country’s constitution. The protest was organized by the opposition on 20 October in Brazzaville, the Republic of Congo.

While he was being questioned by the Public Prosecutor, he was arrested by police officers and brought to the Central Police Station of Brazzaville where he was questioned on several occasions in the absence of his lawyer. His wife was not allowed to visit him and bring him food during the first day of his detention.

He was kept in detention at the police station from 23 November until 1 December without being brought before a court or charged, beyond the statutory 72 hours limit.

Paulin Makaya was brought before the Public Prosecutor and later an investigating judge of the High Court in Brazzaville on 1 December. He was charged with “incitement to disturb public order for having taken part in the 20 October protest and for having attempted to seize power through illegal means”, “unlawful possession of weapons of war” and “complicity in arson of public buildings”.

ADDITIONAL INFORMATION

A referendum to amend the Republic of Congo's Constitution was held on 25 October to give way for, amongst other things, the current President to run for a third term in office in 2016.

Ahead of the referendum, media freedom was severely curtailed with mobile Internet services, text messaging and the transmission signal of some radio stations being cut in Brazzaville. Freedom of assembly was also restricted and many demonstrations were banned while other were met with unnecessary and excessive use of force. The referendum was preceded by demonstrations organised in Brazzaville, Pointe Noire and across other towns in the Republic of Congo to express dissent over the proposed changes to the constitution. Congo's security used excessive and at times unnecessary force against protesters and fired live ammunition at protesters who had gathered in Brazzaville on 20 October. Clashes between security forces and protesters led to the death of at least six protesters and left several injured.

Following the passing of the amendments to the constitution on 27 October and its confirmation by the Constitutional Court on 6 November, there was a wave of arrests and widespread intimidation of those who openly opposed to the constitutional amendments. Paulin Makaya's residence was surrounded and ransacked by unknown individuals and security forces on 30 October. In relation to this event, on 20 November, he filed a complaint before the Public Prosecutor of the High Court of Brazzaville for trespassing and attempted murder.

It is common practice in Congo for family members of detained persons to bring them food as this is not sometimes adequately provided by authorities.
