Death Penalty

30 March 1994

WESTERN SAMOA Sesela Mato Afoa, aged 31

Amnesty International has learned that Sesela Mato Afoa was sentenced to death in March 1994 for taking part in the murder of Nuutai Fatiala Mafulu on 25 September 1993 in the village of Lona, Fagaloa District.

Nuutai Fatiala Mafulu was a village chief who had recently returned to Lona, having been banned from the area 20 years earlier. Since then, he had been living in New Zealand. Soon after his return to Lona, Mafulu had several disagreements with the fono (village council made up of matai (chiefs and orators)). These disagreements apparently included his refusal to pay a village fine and his opposition to a night curfew, and led to the village council ordering his execution according to traditional customs. On 25 September 1993 Mafulu was shot dead in front of his wife and children. After the shooting his house, shop and two vehicles were burned.

Six chiefs were due to be tried in March on charges of inciting or procuring the death of Mafulu, although Amnesty International does not have details of any proceedings undertaken.

BACKGROUND INFORMATION

Western Samoa retains the death penalty for treason and murder although Amnesty International has received no reports of any executions.

The Head of State has the power to commute death sentences and takes a decision after consultation with ministers.
